Questions from Council

Mirtha Becerra commented that she's interested in seeing this work folded into code reform. Question about the county survey, do we know the ratio of respondents between city and county residents? What is the definition of small ag land and is it economically viable? Erika Berglund responded that the responses were primarily from inside the city limits, and a lot of distinction between them in terms of their priorities. Also, the county is in the early stages of looking at conservation servitudes to allow small ag parcels to be preserved, possibly those under 30 acres. Those small parcels are a significant part of the local economy and should be invested in.

Mike Nugent asked about the details of the county plan, questioning how the agreements would work for easement-type arrangements on these small parcels. Also asked about meat packing public-private partnerships that might be feasible to alleviate the meat-packing bottleneck. Erika Berglund responded that they are still exploring options about what portions of the process are both needed, what can be supported by the local workforce, etc. There are some exciting projects going forward in other areas of the state, like a Helena co-op model. Has the investment at the MPC level been helpful? Yes, the program out of Big Sky has been helpful and could make this more viable than other programs in other areas.

Gwen Jones asked about the history of the meat packing infrastructure. Erika Berglund responded that many decades ago there was more infrastructure. More recently there has been an increased interest in local sustainable food systems. Local suppliers have to currently drive to Superior, and of course, there are labor issues as well creating up to six-month delays. Erika Berglund mentioned there is some local infrastructure could use support to be expanded.
